When Siemens AG expanded operations into India and China, it faced difficulties in aligning German corporate culture with local workforce expectations. German managers emphasized structure, efficiency, and direct communication, while employees in Asia valued hierarchy, group consensus, and relationship-building.

The HR department launched a "Global Connect Program" aimed at building cultural sensitivity. This included cross-cultural training, exchange visits, and leadership workshops. Despite these initiatives, friction persisted-particularly around performance appraisals and incentive systems. German managers prioritized merit-based pay and accountability, while local teams expected collective rewards and respect for seniority.

Siemens later adapted its HRM approach by combining both systems. It implemented hybrid performance appraisals-balancing individual metrics with team-based recognition-and introduced "cultural mentors" to support foreign managers. Within two years, employee engagement and retention improved significantly, and Siemens became recognized as a model for culturally adaptive HRM.

Questions:

- a) Identify and explain the major cross-cultural challenges Siemens faced in India and China.
- b) How did Siemens modify its HRM practices to suit local cultures?
- c) What lessons can global HR managers learn from this case regarding cultural adaptability?
